

At Faketown High School, a newly hired teacher, Mr. Practice, begins to lecture to their students about American History, and the fall of the economy during the Great Depression. The semester has been going for a month, Mr. Practice has started to become comfortable with the students in his class. One of the students, Matt Edhair, has been a habitual sleeper in History class. As far as Mr. Practice can tell, Matt has been falling asleep in class about 2 times a week all semester.

As the semester has gone on, students in class have become more aware of the sleeping student, and have started to make a distraction around it. Addie Straction, who sits next to Matt in History class, has started to spread rumors about Matt, and making a distraction about his sleeping. She has started to tell her friends that Matt is homeless, and the reason he is sleeping in class is because his desk is more comfortable than the ground. Not only is it becoming a distraction in class, but the rumors are causing issues outside of the classroom. During lunch duty, Mr. Practice overhears a table talking about his class. Students are becoming irritated with Matt's sleeping, because it is causing Addie to burst out, and distracting the learning environment.

As the instructor, the teacher learns that Matt's consistent napping has been an issue in other classes as well. Matt has been spotted spending many school nights working multiple different jobs, and Mr. Practice knows that his family is new to the community, and could possibly be struggling to keep up with new payments and bills.

At first, Matt's sleeping was not a distraction to anyone else, but as more students have started to take note of the habit, the greater the consequences have become.
